

The Grieving Family

How often have we heard the phrase “the family has never been the same since (the person) died”?

The truth is things can never be the same after the death of somebody in a family. When a close relative dies, it not only causes a major grief reaction in us as individuals, but it also effects how your family functions. This doesn't mean that your family will never function well again, but adjusting to the death can be painful and it takes time.

How do families grieve?

Each family grieves in their own way; just as each person grieves in their own way. Most families have unwritten “rules” about what can be spoken about and what feelings can be expressed openly. These rules often become more obvious when there is a crisis in the family, like a death. Some families are comfortable being sad, angry or upset in front of one another. In other families, it's frowned upon to let people know how you're feeling. Some families see crying as a sign of weakness or may only be comfortable with women crying, not men. Families also differ in how much information they share with each other and how much they include the children in family matters.

One of the tasks a family faces when somebody dies is to find a way to grieve together. It's important that family members have a chance to share their grief. This doesn't have to be done in any particular way and can vary greatly from family to family.

The time immediately after a death is usually a time when relatives come together. While some families find this closeness very supportive, others find it difficult. Some families get together infrequently and may find it stressful spending a lot of time together.

It's not unusual that families have disagreements and arguments, particularly when things are stressful. Family members can disagree over decisions concerning the funeral, the burial or the disposal of personal effects.

During the weeks and months after a death, you may want to talk about the person who died, to reminisce with family members or to cry, while some family members may prefer to keep their feelings to themselves. Some may feel ready to get back to work or to begin socialising again soon after the death. This can be difficult for others to accept. Some people may avoid mentioning the person who died believing it may cause upset.

This too can lead to misunderstandings. As one young man commented: “Nobody mentions Mary anymore, am I the only one who remembers her?”

Different family relationships

When a family member dies, the loss is different for everyone. For example, if you're grieving the death of your husband, others will be grieving the death of their father, their brother, their grandfather, their uncle and so on. We all have different relationships within the family. Some family members will be particularly close, while others may have a strained relationship. This explains partly why people within the family have different grief reactions.

Family roles

Each member has several roles within the family. Roles such as wage earner, parent, child and sibling are very important and the absence of the person who filled that role will be deeply felt. For example, there are financial issues when a wage earner dies. Or if the mother of young children dies, they will need childcare.

Other roles may be less obvious but can leave gaps in the family that make it difficult to function. For example, the role of peacemaker, the person who knows how to break tension with a joke or the person who remembers important family occasions. Family members may expect a particular person to take on the role and this can cause tension. As one woman put it: “Everyone assumed I would take over Dad's care when Mam died, but I have just started a new job.”

Irish Hospice Foundation

To die and grieve well wherever the place

No one can ever replace the person who died, but with time and good communication, most families adjust to the loss and find new ways to function together.

As your family grieves, remember:

- Everyone grieves differently. Allow each member to grieve in his or her own way.
- Try to talk openly with other family members; let them know how you feel and listen to what they have to say. Expect that others will have different opinions and points of view.
- When somebody dies, the family is changed and everyone has to adjust to those changes. This can be very difficult, but most families find their own way through it.
- It can be helpful to talk to someone outside the family if your family is having particular difficulties

Useful Resources

Irish Childhood Bereavement Network

www.childhoodbereavement.ie icbn@hospicefoundation.ie

Irish Hospice Foundation

Further suggested reading is available from our Thérèse Brady Library, library@hospicefoundation.ie

Bereavement & Loss Hub

www.bereaved.ie

Bereavement Support Line

Freephone 1800 80 70 77. Available Monday to Friday, 10am-1pm. In partnership with the HSE.

Produced by Irish Hospice Foundation's Bereavement Education & Resource Centre
info@hospicefoundation.ie
(01) 679 3188
www.hospicefoundation.ie

With thanks to Dr Matthew Farrelly